The census report shows Oklahoma to have a total population of 1,637,000, Kansas 1,690,000 and Nebraska 1,192,000. Here Kansas shows a nice lead, but in point of population as compared to square miles of territory, Kansas has 20.6, to the square mile, and Nebraska only 15.4, while Oklahoma leads with 23.5, to the square mile. From this we infer that Kansas is not so crowded as Oklahoma, and offers more to the prospective settler. Now this doesn't apply especially to the eastern part of the state, but more to the southwest.

The question now remains, will Wheeler be able to get either of these measures passed. It is now a fair test of his ability as a statesman. In other words it is up to Wheeler.
